Petersbourg, January 26.

LETTERS from Constantinople advise, that the Grand Signior, in an extraordinary Divan which was lately assembled, and very numerous, confirmed the Declaration that he had made before of the Continuance of his good Disposition towards Peace, with the only View of procuring Ease and Quiet to the People of his Empire. He then acquainted them with his Resolution to go and take upon himself the Command of the great Army, in case he could not come to an Accommodation with the Christians before the Opening of the next Campaign: That he had determined to take with him all the Janissaries of his Guard, excepting a Detachment of that Corps, which he will leave for the Security of Constantinople, and will reinforce that Detachment with 20,000 Men of the Troops that are now raising in Asia. That as he perceived there were great Difficulties in raising the Subsidies ordered, he would supply out of his own Treasure what was wanting. And that Prince Ragotzi is to make the Campaign with him. These Letters add, That the Tent for the Grand Signior was actually preparing. That the Augmentation of the Fleet to serve on the Black Sea was hastening with all possible Expedition; and that the Grand Signior has lately sent express Orders to his two Armies to continue the War during the Winter, if possible, or at least to begin again their Operations as soon as the Snow is melted, that they may not be prevented by the Enemies.
